

For mentoring countless low-income students, first-generation students, and students from underrepresented communities in deeply impactful ways, and for supporting their well-being and success;

For championing students pursuing public interest work in positions that are both deeply meaningful and difficult to land, and for supporting all law students in acquiring the skills needed to act for the public interest;

For developing an innovative pipeline program to attract diverse students to a career in law, and for supporting the leadership training of diverse mid-career leaders working in social justice;

For playing a key role in launching the new Center for Racial Justice at Stanford Law School, a university hub for policy-focused, action-oriented racial justice research and education;

Diane Chin

*Associate Dean for Public Service and Public Interest Law
Acting Director of the Stanford Center for Racial Justice
